The role of research in applied economics in the context of an economy or business is greatly increasing in modern times. In quantitative research, the researcher is ideally an objective observer who neither participates in nor influences what is being studied.

To avoid these errors, the statistician must take proper precaution and care. For example, when the researcher is trying to obtain data on drug addiction or the habit of taking liquor, there is high probability that the addicted person will not supply the desired data and hence disturb the whole research process.

Morse, Janice

Hence, a researcher has to be very cautious and careful while choosing a part of data mean the data collected for the first time, whereas secondary data mean the data that have already been collected and used earlier by somebody or some agency.
